Q: Does setting up a command line as a user save any horsepower or speed improvement on a server? I'm wondering if anyone knows if using `sudo adduser` vs. adding a user directly to the OS will make any difference performance wise (and if it won't, is there any other reason to use the `adduser` command instead of just adding a user via the GUI?). We've recently upgraded our Ubuntu 16.04 server from 14.04, and I noticed during the upgrade that the GUI also asked me to enter a password and confirm password, but at the end instead of "add user" it said "create new home directory". I didn't realize that it was different, and after logging out and back in everything was working fine. However, now when I log in as the user it's asking for a password, and that's why I'm asking. Is there any difference between adding a user using the GUI vs. `sudo adduser`? A: `Adduser` command is just for administrating a user. It makes no difference for security and other things. It just "adds" a user and configures the user. It's just like another user, but he is set up for a specific task. You can do everything with `sudo` or `adduser`.

Bridge of the Orinoco The Bridge of the Orinoco () is a bridge over the Orinoco River in Venezuela in the city of Barquisimeto. It is located at the intersection of the Carretera Central and the Route 1. It was designed by the architect Diego Díaz Angarita (1852-1924), member of the Guayanesian Academy of Arts and Sciences, and completed in 1926. History The bridge was built by Guayanesian workers, the first governor of the state of Lara (who ordered the construction of the first bridge on the Orinoco and received the name of Dr. Pedro de Alcántara de la Torre) The first stone used in the construction dates back to the year 1864, when the Concession was signed between the Venezuelan government and the company Welles (organized in London). It was in this year that the foundation was laid, and the workers started work. The largest bridge in Venezuela, it was also the biggest construction project in the country at that time. Neuro-oncological pitfalls in brain metastases surgery. Brain metastases occur in 20-60% of all patients with cancer and may cause considerable neurological morbidity and mortality. Most of these metastases are treated with primary resection, sometimes guided by intraoperative awake monitoring. Often repeated brain metastases surgery is necessary and the indication for surgery is the neurological status of the patient. But surgery to be performed in patients with brain metastases has to balance morbidity, mortality, neurological outcome, quality of life, diagnostic results, cost, and the data of response to systemic cancer treatment. The increasing knowledge of cerebral metastases biology, the development of novel radiological and novel neurosurgical techniques have opened a new field of precision neurosurgery, where surgical resection can be tailored to specific and individual patient characteristics. The aim of this review is to make an overview of the problems and pitfalls in neuro-oncological situations and brain metastases surgery.

Phage-encoded filamentous hemagglutinin (fHA) - a virulence factor of Salmonella enterica serovar Typhimurium. Salmonella enterica serovar Typhimurium (S. Typhimurium) is a major foodborne pathogen. S. Typhimurium strains that are routinely used for vaccine development are attenuated by the phase I flagellar phase variation system. The product of this system, filamentous hemagglutinin (fHA), is a major virulence factor of this serovar. The purpose of this study was to examine if additional virulence factors were encoded on the genome of the phase II S. Typhimurium strain LT2. DNA microarray technology was used to analyse both the wild type (wt) and phase II genome. Three open reading frames with homology to proteins of the fHA system could be detected on plasmid pSLT. The other genes of the identified system were either located on chromosome or plasmid. Two of the proteins, early fHA protein (efHA) and the usher protein (sipA) are components of the fHA system. A third protein was identified and it was a homologue to the fHA protein. This protein is called fH2 and was antigenic and presented a hevein-like domain, a domain also found in fHA. A non-polar mutation in the gene for efHA impaired fHA production, indicating that
